The competitor reserves the right to answer the question at the touch of a button, his lights will light up and the sound is emitted. Other stations are immediately disabled until the presenter restores the system. To get this behavior, you can proceed in two different ways: ** microcontroller or digital circuits : one or more chips on the electronic board is enough to make the logical part of the quiz system. PRO: fully customizable, inexpensive (especially for scale production), centralized. CONTRO: more design time is needed, the implementation of one prototype takes time. ** electromechanical circuits : logic is achieved by diodes and relays. PRO: cheap, easy to build, reliable. CONTRO: not for production on a scale, not customizable, complexity grows with the number of stations. The second trip was initially just a challenge, but then I started to figure out that it was the best option. Interestingly, the electromechanical circuit is a skeleton on which you can build possible digital/computer management in the future. Look at the schemes. Relays are decentralized because they are part of the button/lamp system circuit. In this way, the circuit is more logical and easy to build. The buttons are normally closed, so they keep the relays excited by closing the circuit. When the button is pressed, the relay is released, so two things open: the circuit of the relay button opens, so that if the button is released, nothing happens (this ensures an accurate overview of the moment of pressing) and the second circuit is closed by turning on the light indicator, the acoustic indicator and forcing the other relays. The last issue is achieved through a network of diodes. Of course, the more stations you want, the more complex the network. Last but not least, resetting and suppressing switches (logically different, electrically identical) forces all relays and closes their circuits again until it presses the large red button. The part of the circuit where the microcontroller is most missing is the acoustic signal. It must be time-limited, so a timer is needed. A microcontroller would do this with software without any problems (... fully customizable... also meant this). The network at the bottom of the schemes provides a good enough timer (not accurate because capacitors have to drain between one reservation and the other), with a choice between short, long and none. No.
